

Albert Coates Gets an Ovation At Last Concert

By Sylvester Rauling.

CONDUCTORS just now hold first place in the music field. Less than a week ago Arturo Toscanini, with his La Scala Orchestra, came back to us a flaming torch to set afire his Italian compatriots and to stir American music lovers. Two days later Albert Coates, the English conductor, guest of Walter Damrosch and the Symphony Society, disclosed his talents. Last night Arthur Bodanzky, leading the National Symphony Orchestra, made a farewell appearance in that capacity for three months. Willem Mengelberg, the Dutch conductor, is to take Mr. Bodanzky's place at the next concert of the society.

Mr. Coates sails for England tomorrow. He will carry back with him recollections of an appreciation of his talents and his personality in New York that will repay him for his hurried visit. At his third and last concert at Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon he was made the recipient of an ovation from an audience of American music lovers that was as spontaneous as it was merited and the like of which rarely can be recalled. The tribute paid to Mr. Toscanini at the Metropolitan Opera House last week was to an old friend; that to Mr. Coates yesterday afternoon was to one who was a stranger within our gates until a week ago. There were as many people clamoring unreservedly for admission as go in.

Mr. Coates' masterfulness, the consciousness of his musicianship, the electric flash that he transmits to the players by means of his commanding arms and his athletic body and the engaging quality of his personality were grasped instantly by the audience. The men of the orchestra were as enthusiastic over him as the audience. As one of them remarked in my hearing, "he is a regular fellow; he is a good mixer."

And how they did play up to him! Perhaps Walter Damrosch's reply, when I asked him how it seemed to him to listen to his orchestra led by another man epitomizes the part they played. He said: "I never was so sure of what a splendid orchestra it is my privilege to direct."

Of the programme it is necessary to say only that Mr. Coates presented his first symphony in a manner so vivid and human that one forgot the composer as an academician. Of Scriabin's "Poeme de l'Extase" he made an intoxicating riot. He had made an intoxicating riot.

He had made an intoxicating riot. He had made an intoxicating riot. He had made an intoxicating riot.

He had made an intoxicating riot. He had made an intoxicating riot. He had made an intoxicating riot.

He had made an intoxicating riot. He had made an intoxicating riot. He had made an intoxicating riot.

concerto in B flat minor Sergei Rachmaninoff, the eminent Russian composer, who played with all his masterfulness and won a fine tribute for himself.

Artur Bodanzky's programme for the National Symphony Orchestra's concert at Carnegie Hall last night was a repetition of one presented last week, consisting of Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben," and the Mendelssohn concerto for violin, with Fritz Kreisler as soloist. Mr. Bodanzky was called out half a dozen times and applauded vehemently by both audience and players. Mr. Kreisler, of course, won his customary and well-deserved tribute.

Josef Stravinsky and the Philharmonic Orchestra at a concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon played Dvorak's "From the New World" symphony, Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" tone poem, and Beethoven's "The Ninth" symphony. The soloist was Joan Mason, violinist, in Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole," his playing marked by eloquence though lacking in warmth.

The Metropolitan Opera House concert last night, conducted by Mr. Damrosch, was given up to Verdi's "Aida," the latter's "Cavalleria Rusticana," with Frances Peralta (in the place of Emmy Destinn indisposed), Flora Perini, Marion Teiva, Beniamino Gigli, Giuseppe Danieleschi, and the chorus, sung in concert form. Rosa Ponselle, Gigli, Morgan Kingston, Jose Marcano and the chorus were heard in Verdi compositions.
